By GEORGE BARR M'CUTCHEON

(RICHARD GREAVES)

FOU are both fortunate and unfortunate, Mr. Brewster," said Mr. Grant, after the young man had dropped into a chair in the office of Grant & Ripley the next day. Montgomery wore a slightly bored expression, and it was evident that he took little interest in the will of James T. Sedgwick. From far back in the recesses of memory he now recalled this long lost brother of his mother. As a very small child he had seen his Uncle James upon the few occasions which brought him to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Brewster. But the young man had dined with the Drews the night before and Barbara had had more charm for him than usual. It was of her that he was thinking when he walked into the office of Swearengen Jones' lawyers.

"The truth is, Mr. Grant, I'd completely forgotten the existence of an uncle," he responded.

"It is not surprising," said Mr. Grant genially. "Every one who knew him in New York nineteen years ago believed him to be dead. He left the city when you were a very small lad, going to Australia, I think. He was off to seek his fortune, and he needed it pretty badly when he started out. This letter from Mr. Jones comes like a message from the dead. Were it not that we have known Mr. Jones for a long time, handling affairs of considerable importance for him, I should feel inelined to doubt the whole story. It seems that your uncle turned up in Montana about fifteen years ago and there formed a stanch friendship with old Swearengen Jones, one of the richest men in the far west. Sedgwick's will was signed on the day of his death. Sept. 24, and it was quite natural that Mr. Jones should be named as his executor. That is now we became interest ed in the matter, Mr. Brewster."

"I see," said Montgomery, somewhat puzzled. "But why do you say that I am both fortunate and unfortunate?" "The situation is so remarkable that you'll consider that a mild way of putting it when you've heard everything. I think you were told in our note of yesterday that you are the sole heir. Well, it may surprise you to learn that James Sedgwick died possessed of an estate valued at almost $7,000,000,"

Montgomery Brewster sat like one petrified, staring blankly at the old lawyer, who could say startling things in a level voice.

"He owned gold mines and ranches in the northwest, and there is no ques tion as to their value. Mr. Jones in his letter to us briefly outlines the his tory of James Sedgwick from the time be landed in Montana. He reached there in 1885 from Australia, and he was worth $30,000 or $40,000 at the time. Within five years he was the owner of a huge ranch, and scarcely had another five years passed before he was part owner of three rich gold mines. Possessions accumulated rapidly; everything he touched turned to gold. He was shrewd, careful and thrifty, and his money was handled with all the skill of a Wall street financier. At the time of his death in Portland he did not owe a dollar in the world. His property is absolutely unincumbered-safe and sound as a government bond. It's rather overwhelming, isn't it?" the lawyer concluded, taking note of Brewster's expression. "And he-he left everything to me?" "With a proviso."

"I have a copy of the will. Mr. Ripley and I are the only persons in New York who at present know its contents. You I am sure after hearing it, will not divulge them without the most careful deliberation."

a pigeonhole in his desk, adjusted his glasses and prepared to read. Then, as though struck by a sudden thought, he laid the paper down and turned The President Talks Plainly

"It seems that Sedgwick never married. Your mother was his sister and his only known relative of close connection. He was a man of most peculiar temperament, but in full possession of his mental faculties. You may find this will to be a strange document, but I think Mr. Jones, the executor, explains any mystery that may be suggested by its terms. While Sedgwick's whereabouts were unknown to his old friends in New York, it seems that he was fully posted on all that was going on here. He knew that you were the his only nephew. He sets forth the dates of your mother's marriage, of your birth, of the death of Robert Brewster and of Mrs. Brewster. He also was aware of the fact that old Edwin Peter Brewster intended to bequeath a large fortune to you, and never forgave the person who touched roughly upon his pride. You know, of course, that your father married Miss ter opposition on the part of Edwin Brewster. The latter refused to recogdisowned his son and heaped the harshest kind of calumny upon the Sedgwicks. It was commonly believed about town that Jim Sedgwick left the country three or four years after this marriage for the sole reason that he and Edwin Brewster could not live in the same place. So deep was his batred of the old man that he fled to escape one occasion he visited the office of his ing him, but something prevented. In the event that particular complied with the requirements of the will to the full satisfaction of the said executor, Swearengen Jones, the estate was to be distributed among certain institutions of charity designated in the instrument. Underlying this imperative injunction of James Sedgwick was plainly discernible the motive that prompted it. In almost so many words he declared that his heir should not receive the fortune if he possessed a single penny that had come to him in any shape or form from the man he hated, Edwin Peter Brewster. While Sedgwick could not have known at the time of his death that the banker had bequeathed $1,-000,000 to his grandson, it was more than apparent that he expected the young man to be enriched liberally by his enemy. It was to preclude any possible chance of the mingling of his fortune with the smallest portion of Edwin P. Brewster's that James Sedgwick on his deathbed put his hand to this astonishing instrument.

There is where these cities should be very cautions about rates to be charged and the terms on which rural lines may get connnection. The farmers over the state want telephone service and where they build and keep up their own lines should be able to get counection with the city lines on reasonable terms. The rural lines are a great convenience and of mutual benefit both to the city and to the farmers. That city is fortunate that has rural telephone lines extending out in every direction.

"Folks have lent money to Willie Porter before this and never seen the color o' their money again." said Mr. Compton, "and Mr. Stubbs made his money by hard work and saving. He'd hate to lose a mite of it."

"He wouldn't lose a mite of it," said Mrs. Compton indignantly. "Willie's been unfortunate, but so have some others now and again. Do you recollect your fancy squash investment? Well, anyway, this time Willie had excellent security to offer, and he was willing to pay back 2 per cent at the end too."

"What security?" asked Mr. Compton, not deigning to refer to the rate of interest offered.

"He offered Mr. Stubbs two dozen silver teaspoons and a ladle," said Mrs. Compton impressively, "besides a feather boa and a seal plush coat and a sewing machine that runs the easiest of any in this town. Logansport, Ind., July 8.-Miss Fern Tolley of this city has become the bride of A. S. Shriner at Johnstown, Pa., and they will make their home in Los Angeles, Cal. They were married in Pennsylvania because of the Indiana law. The invitations had been issued for a marriage at the Tolley home, but when the bride-elect, together with Mr. Shriner, presented themselves before the county clerk for the necessary license, and Miss Tolley was handed the blank to be filled as provided under the new law, her indignation knew no bounds. "The very idea," she exclaimed, as her eye glanced over the questions to be answered. "This is impertinence. It is absurd to ask me if I have ever been in the poorhouse, if I am an idiot, and if I have ever been married before And to have to tell a perfect stranger how old I am under oath-that is too much. I will leave the state before I will answer such foolish questions,' and she took the arm of her husbandelect and walked away. Mr. Shriner immediately returned to Pennsylvania to prepare for the wedding, and the bride-elect and her relatives followed when the details had been arranged.

LAW UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Legislative Regulation of Private Banks Gets a Setback.

Indianapolis, July 8 .- Judge Fremont Alford of the criminal court has upheld the private bankers in the po sition that the law is unconstitutional in that it is in conflict with provisions of the constitution of the United States and the state of Indiana.

Judge Adford's ruling was in the case brought by the private bankers of the state as a test of the new law. Seth M. Richcreek, a private banker of this city, was the defendant, and was charged with violating the law by failure to file statements relative to his bank, with the auditor of state. In his decision Judge Alford took up the various provisions of the act.
